military's Predator drones may be able to see through walls and sand, but they can't fly in water.
Yet. The military's unmanned aerial vehicles are used to conduct surveillance, helping to identify insurgents, coordinate fire from other aircraft and gather intelligence. But with watertight technology that limits UAV pilots' ability to call in an airstrike on an object in the ocean, the military is one step away from using its drones to conduct ocean searches and even hunts for terrorists and drug smugglers. But that day may not be far off. The Navy and Marines are starting to collect data on the potential to equip some UAVs with hydrostatic stability technology, which provides a fixed and steady platform to balance the aircraft in strong winds, waves and swells and give air crews more confidence in flying the machines in bad weather.
