AutoCAD 2008 Category:Windows-only software Category:Dynamics (company) Category:Windows-only software made by Microsoft; mysql: why the difference between two scripts? I have two scripts: mysql> create table prhdr (name varchar(6) not null, email varchar(50) not null, passwd varchar(40) not null, salt varchar(10) not null, etype varchar(15) not null, PRI_KEY (name)) TYPE=MyISAM; Query OK, 0 rows affected (0.00 sec) mysql> create table prhdr (name varchar(6) not null, email varchar(50) not null, passwd varchar(40) not null, salt varchar(10) not null, etype varchar(15) not null, PRIMARY KEY (name)) TYPE=MyISAM; Query OK, 0 rows affected (0.00 sec) The first syntax looks more concise to me, but when I execute the query the second one works fine. Why? A: It's not because the syntax is not the same that each one is valid, only the first one is syntactically correct to MyISAM and the second one is syntactically correct to InnoDB. When you use MyISAM you don't have INNODB_LOCK_MODE therefore you have to tell how you are going to lock your table. MyISAM MyISAM also comes in various flavors. MySQL can lock the entire table in various ways, and the type of locking determines the semantics of locking. For instance, having the row-level locking enabled means that, as you execute the following INSERT statement, MySQL will wait until you commit the transaction. InnoDB InnoDB also comes in various flavors. MySQL can lock the entire table in various ways, and the type of locking determines the semantics of locking. For instance, having the row-level locking enabled means that, as you execute the following INSERT statement, MySQL will wait until you commit the transaction. MyISAM has no notion of locking whereas InnoDB has it.
