I have a script src: When I run this I get a simple HTML file with the following content (below): If I change the first line to: then I get the following (below): Notice the script tag is followed by a script tag. I have done some digging and found the following article: - Web Page to Script Tag Conversion The web browser converts a tag to a tag, but why does this only happen to the first script tag? A: It's not the only problem. There's also the possibility of malformed HTML, which might not cause a parse error (see issue) but still fails to work. // function test() { alert('Hello world!'); } //]]> It's hard to know what was going on without seeing all of your code. A: This would be a malformed HTML. For example: alert("yo") This is how browsers handle such tags. For example, see the following images: I believe in your case, it is safe to assume that the first is malformed, and the browser tries to handle it as a script tag. the board, the disclosure of which is incorporated herein by reference. That disclosure describes a method of making a sharp angled cut in an absorbent product. The absorbent product includes a plurality of absorbent panels joined to a central backsheet.
