These cells have a strategic location, in the lacunae of the bone matrix. Osteocytes make a substantial contribution to the bone matrix, so that it is not unusual for the total number of cells in bone to number millions. The cell has a huge reserve of calcium (Ca) which is mobilized when there is a need to increase the mineral density of bone. The osteocyte is highly susceptible to mechanical loading, and it is probable that the osteocyte makes a substantial contribution to the rapid increase in bone mass that occurs following mechanical loading of bone. Thus, osteocytes play a key role in the adaptive response of the skeleton. The osteocytes also may play a key role in the rate of deterioration of bone as a consequence of disease. Osteocytes are the primary mediators of the cascade of events that leads to bone resorption and are involved in bone remodeling. There is evidence that osteocytes respond to osteogenic growth factors, and that the activities of osteoblasts and osteoclasts are influenced by the state of the osteocyte. The osteocyte is therefore critical to the regulation of bone turnover and bone mass. Abnormalities in osteocyte function may play a role in the pathogenesis of bone disease. Preliminary studies in osteoporotic vertebrae suggest that the osteocyte may have a role in the formation of the vertebral fracture. In addition, there is emerging evidence that osteocyte number may have a strong influence on bone cell function. Osteocyte number and size increase following mechanical loading, while osteocyte apoptosis decreases. These changes have been associated with rapid and adaptive increases in bone mass, and they have been associated with rapid increases in bone formation and bone resorption. Since osteocytes are so important to bone and are so sensitive to change, it is likely that they will respond to pharmacologic agents affecting bone mass and turnover. It is the aim of this study to determine the effects of agents that increase and decrease bone mass and turnover on the osteocyte.Fluorescence quenching of human serum albumin by nanos
