To me, this looks like a social network for computer nerds. What that means is that there are plenty of sites that do the same thing, but there are no other applications for you to use that don't suck. A better version of this is ShoeMonkey.com - where you can drag and drop shoes into one another (3D). And, because that's what I was thinking: If you wanted, you could make ShoeMonkey.com into an RSS reader like Semiramis. If you end up somewhere, don't forget to change the name. ~~~ kentf You could also just use web RSS. Just like the original site. ~~~ DrHankPym I thought about that, but I wanted to add in a neat way to keep track of URLs. ----- Shorel You are going to need some kind of captcha for these simple situations. You must have a better plan. You can have a quick picture of a URL and (probably) you'll get it

Q: How do I hide the cached data of an Android SQLiteCursor? I'm wondering how I would go about making a few columns of my SQLiteCursor/CursorLoader invisible to the user for search purposes. Or perhaps, any suggestions as to how to speed up my app even if the user can use multiple columns for searching? A: Since versions 2.2.1 (removed in 4.0 (Compatibility in Android 2.2.x only)), Android supplies CursorLoader with CREATE VIEW SQL statement to retrieve data from tables but do not expose it to the user. CREATE VIEW WITH NO IDS or SELECT * FROM TABLE select for number of tables, for each of them a different column. So these days, with a recent version (2.2.4 as I've tested), Android doesn't ask for an id column. So I just defined a VIEW without any columns and included it in my select statement. With 3 tables the result was: t1: 1970 rows, 36 bytes, With view (mostly same for all tables) t2: 19198 rows, 96 bytes, With view (mostly same for all tables) t3: 9980 rows, 48 bytes, With view (mostly same for all tables) A: This is the version mentioned in the link in the comments: Cursor CursorLoader = mContext.getContentResolver().query(ContactsContract.CommonDataKinds.Phone.CONTENT_URI, null, ContactsContract.CommonDataKinds.Phone.CONTACT_ID, null
