“The year we started working on FIFA, one of the things that got us excited as a development team was the introduction of motion capture in the game,” said Craig Ewer, Studio Head of EA SPORTS Football. “Being in the same room with the players was amazing and the transition from a visual simulation to being able to interact with the player and see the movements, bruises, cracks and tears of the real thing was a dream come true. “This year we’ve been dreaming even bigger. By collecting even more data from the players during a full game, and having them wear motion capture suits on pitch while playing, we can recreate exactly what these players feel and experience when they’re actually on the field playing. We can now collect data on acceleration, body impact, heights, pitches, catches, fast breaks, passing, tackles, collisions and more. With this data, we can construct an almost completely accurate representation of the action on pitch.” “By doing this,” he continued, “we can bring the feeling and intensity of match day into your living room. We’ve got our best ever control system and player models, coupled with unique animations and an all-new engine, and we’ve applied the HyperMotion Technology to gameplay. “Every time a player takes a touch, make a pass, or make a run, you’ll now feel like you’re in the same position as the player. It’s great for players who come to training and want to experience what it’s like to play from positions they’ve never had access to before, whilst giving them the option to do it on their own terms.” FIFA 22 implements revolutionary motion capture The new motion capture data provides an all-new level of accuracy, with the player movements, physicality and a more realistic height being the most obvious examples. “Moving to the next level of animation has been a challenge,” explained Ramon Perez, senior designer. “When we first started working on animations back in FIFA 19, we used the data we had. However, working with the system to make sure each part of the animation was reacting in the way we expected them to have been collected, was a long and difficult process. It’s great to see this technology now in action. Our goal was for players to feel immersed in the world of
