The people in my neighborhood included prostitutes; those did not look or act like they should be called "professional women," however. Too often in the US, I think, it's called "profession" when the profession is a low one like prostitution or, and this is the one in the West that causes my eyes to widen every time I hear it, teaching (and sometimes practicing). Because I keep the power cord under my bed, I have an outlet in my room and in the bathroom. That's because I don't want to risk a security bill from a power surge -- I can handle a power surge from time to time, but having been in an electrical fire and having worked for a company that built the power plants on site for a major company, I know that a power surge can be a very serious and expensive event. I live in a city, too, but if it ever made it to me, it would be a very long time before it was inexpensive enough for me to replace the power

I met this guy at a bar last night and he was really nice and got my number but I don't want to start anything up with him and then have to end it with him. What's the best way to go about this? - scared out of my mind Omg I'm scared. Honestly your decision to go out with someone is only yours to make. As you said, it's not fair of you to try and be friends with someone you do not have any feelings for, so that's a safe way to go about things. Once you make the move and do meet in person, his behavior will be a better indicator of how he feels about you. If he's awkward and aloof he might not be interested, but if he's friendly and eager to start conversations and compliments your looks, then he might have a little more to him. That being said, a lot of guys are afraid to make the first move, so being cautious is a good thing. If he does not seem interested in you, maybe he's not a
