Image caption In the same year five police officers were injured by "volatile and malicious" youths at the Blakedown Festival in Luton. The police have been asked to investigate the events at the 2014 Notting Hill Carnival following complaints from black police officers. In a letter obtained by the BBC, the Metropolitan Police said they "were at pains to find any evidence of racism". But the National Black Police Association said it was "deeply concerning" that the Met was reopening its probe. On Saturday, the Met held a minute's silence for those killed at last year's event. Last week, West Midlands Police said it had not received any complaint about racism in its response to those killed and injured in Notting Hill. The Met's letter, sent on 2 August, said the "ongoing investigation into the police response to the 2014 Carnival for which the officers from [its] force were injured" could be reopened. Its decision was said to be "based on information received from a witness who was injured while attending the festival". The witness said the police officers sustained injuries after being attacked "by a number of volatile, malicious and unruly youth". The event was described as "provocative and unpleasant" with chanting and alcohol being freely available. The weekend's events were due to begin with a minute's silence at midday on Saturday but this was cancelled at the last minute. The first minutes of silence was observed with police and representatives of the black community, and the Met said it was an "occasion to reflect on the events of last year, with a view to ensuring that it is not repeated". Image caption The Met had blamed the violence on "hooligans" at the carnival last year But the National Black Police Association has said it is "deeply concerning" that the Met is reopening its investigation because complaints from black police officers suggest they were "racially abused by some police officers in the carnival". The group's vice-chairman David Nuttall said: "We do not know the details of the complaint by the police officers that they have received but we would urge the police to investigate this in the same way that they investigated the complaints last year. "And if the evidence of racism is found, then then the police should take up the matter with the public, but in the meantime we should be mindful of the stories of black officers who have received abuse. "
