Focus, distance control, ball anticipation, movement and acceleration are all important aspects of a highly-effective player in real life. For FIFA 19, we used our own bespoke physics engine to recreate the qualities of a player in a way that you wouldn't expect to see in a video game. Now, in FIFA 22, we are using the power of real-life data to make the reactions in real-life physics a key aspect of this gameplay. This is our first time using real-life data to power gameplay. But players are used to action being powered by a motion capture athlete, and we will be able to exploit that level of realism even further in FIFA 22. What we are calling "HyperMotion Technology" uses players' motion capture data to make the detailed physics and animations of the players more realistic. For example, when you are playing on the wing, in FIFA 19 you will notice that, in certain scenarios, some players can drift out of position. When you catch the ball, it will feel as though your player becomes rooted to the ground. It means that you can anticipate a defender's movements and do something about it - and it will feel natural and connected to reality. And as it has in real life, context matters and everything changes with the size and speed of the ball, whether it is a pass, a throw-in or a shot. We want players to take appropriate reactions according to the position of the ball, the size of the ball, the type of player they are, and their position on the pitch. That is all part of the hyper-realism of FIFA 22. We have already been using motion capture data to power controls in Football Manager, but it's been limited to one-on-one scenarios and match analysis. We felt that a full-scale game of high intensity football, such as FIFA, needed more data for contextual control and precision. That is where using full-motion capture data comes in. We have used the data to drive the reaction when a ball is played towards you, whether it is a perfect pass or a poor pass. All of these situations will be influenced by the position of the ball, the size of the ball, the speed of the player, the type of player, the player's off-the-ball behaviours, and the context of the scenario. We are using a two-player motion capture

Features Key:

- New Scouting and Matchday systems improve team data authenticity and accuracy, making the Real Madrid Team of the Season even more realistic.
- New Attacking Intelligence keeps the ball moving, and new Attacking Clicks tell you exactly where, when and how you can attack a situation.
- All-new Real Time Defending, based on the new Total Football philosophy, means a new, action-packed, all-new defensive system.
- Tactics are much more intuitive and stylish, allowing you to match the best method of play to your style of play.
- New Playmaker system, which allows you to express yourself, dictate to your game, from the centre of the park, by pushing and pulling the ball.
- New Volatile Ball System (VBS), which keeps the gameplay stable and consistent from stadium to stadium.
- Fantastic new animation system - the animation of the game is now a 3D, physically based animation system, powered by the Frostbite engine, giving an incredible end-to-end re-creation of football including footwork, balance and technique.
- Expanded Real-Time Strategy feature-line, including:
  - General Improvement of strategy tools that give you better control of your team and fine tune its strengths and weaknesses, including AI challenges, and major new stats, player classes and kits
