Street Cleaner is a scrolling action platform game developed by Bullet Train Software Inc., and published by Digital Leisure. The game was released exclusively for the MSX2 in North America and the VIC20 in Europe. Street Cleaner, originally released as Tom Strong in the United Kingdom, was then rebranded as a Street Cleaner title with the North American and European release, as a sequel to a scrolling action game released for the Atari 2600 back in 1982, called Tom Strong: The City on Fire. I absolutely adore Street Cleaner, which was a big step up from Bullet Train's first game – all the better because it had a tale to tell. You play the same character, Tom, as in the original, but on more levels, and with larger objectives. In fact, the levels are actually longer in scope, and many involve more than one screen at a time. The graphics are gorgeous, with lovely bright colours, and they still look great today. One of my favourite aspects of Street Cleaner is how you can shoot your way through your adversaries and cross the boundaries of the screen, or, in a neat little touch, fall off the end of the screen. It's the sort of game where you can be adventuring in an alleyway and suddenly find yourself dropping into a part of the city you'd normally be walking past. The movement has that satisfying, arcade-style flick to it, which lends a certain amount of speed to the game. The graphics are rendered in a 4-colour, though Street Cleaner uses a simpler kind of palette. This means that instead of the sharp, neon colour scheme of Sonic the Hedgehog (and many other contemporary games), the art style here is more in keeping with the British comic book and computer games of the 1980s, where the graphics consist of a limited number of tints. It's not perfect – it takes too long between acts, particularly at the beginning, and the songs are overplayed. But Street Cleaner is a work of art, deserving of the acclaim it's received – it deserves more attention. You play the same character, Tom, as in the original, but on more levels, and with larger objectives. Besides, I'm glad I got to put that piece of shit "p3" chipset to rest. I'm not even very excited for what might actually come out of it now though. Just let us start getting some real and fun information... What do you mean that isn't a long time coming? If not then what do you mean? It was a long time coming, the prequel to the charmer was coming a long time ago, even though no one seemed to notice and I was disappointed in that regard. Just like the Sly Cooper series, the prequel came out months ahead of the main series. I think I still wait for something like that (not hard), but if it did come out before a new game, I'd probably skip the prequel altogether, prefer the main series would it was cheaper (going off the fact that the prequel was around twice the price) I'm not even very excited for what might actually come out of it now though. Just let us start getting some real and fun information... With the games you get from those computer is pretty bad, guess they were working with a budget. No offense, it's been quite some time, but shouldn't an improvement in graphics be expected over the years? Especially with games like Destiny, Tomb Raider, and

Q: Securing views from a public facing website My client has a web-app, which is open for all to see. Some of his pages are shown in the url. Example : www.mysite.com/index.php?id=42&... What is the best way to stop users logging into his pages?

A: Use SSI, A: Use mod_rewrite to rewrite the URL so that it reads it's files from a path within your site. So, changing the URL to index.php?id=42&blabla... would be rewritten to index.php?id=42&blabla... and the blabla... bit would be the values passed to the PHP script, rather than being in the URL bar. That way, only PHP scripts should be able to access anything within your site. You would need to change your .htaccess file to make this work. This is as much a security measure as anything else, as it stops public users being able to directly access any of your files, but you can still use all the usual scripts and methodologies to make your site as secure as possible.

UPDATE (in response to comment): If, for some reason, you do not have access to your .htaccess file, and it's a shared server, you can make a new directory on your site, with the same names and file contents as the directory you would normally put the .htaccess files in. For example, if your .htaccess files would normally be in /path/to/my/site/directory, you could
