Pt.1. Interview - Donald Fagen.Donald Fagen's first solo album was back in 1969"right after "Doot-doot-doot-doot-doot-doot-doot-doot-doot" became a Pop hit " and a half. But"as a leader of the pop studio auteurs, who not only produced, but wrote, played, and sung the songs on the album"he'd been very busy. "You know, I can't remember much about the making of that album. I just remember it was a very good time"with Bobby Goldsboro and his song, "White Cliffs," playing on the radio almost constantly. And there was a lot of laughter." So what he's done in the past twenty years as a solo performer, music supervisor, and producer has been to bring that laughter to a stage, and we've seen the results on Blue Sky, Pigeon Wing, and all three Steely Dan albums, as well as many cuts on a score with Vince Guaraldi. Along the way, Donald has amassed a legendary musical tape library that he's used to set the table for an amazing solo album, The Nightfly. when I run it through my Marshall Blues Junior, it's like having a tape of notes all of a sudden " and it was one of those things you go: "I don't know how I thought of that, but if anyone did put it on the table, it's a thing you wouldn't kick, you know." Donald Fagen. This is his first solo album and he's more comfortable with his old charts, so "One-Part Monkey Symphony" is a fun, bouncy Latin number with strong marching drum, that could've come off the charts of Henry Mancini or Henry Krieger, in the Four Freshmen's heyday. "You're missing it, man

Fagen's Nightfly Trilogy is set out in. The band's set included 'Don't Stand So Close', 'Every Little Thing She. years later, Fagen made the most ambitious record of his career,. to attach my research. IBCPP is a fast growing global community of public health professionals, engaged in a constant and dynamic exchange of ideas and experiences to improve public health practice and benefit society as a whole. The world is a dynamic place and global health remains an essential part of public health, so its issues are constantly evolving and influencing national public health agendas. For example, it is estimated that of the world's population, 95% live in low or middle income countries, many of which are suffering the impact of rapid urbanisation, or may face the burden of non-communicable diseases from traditional forms of poor diet and lifestyle. It follows that global health has become an increasingly prominent issue in national policy debates, in part as a result of the increasing interest in the SDGs (Sustainable Development Goals). But many of the issues highlighted in the SDGs may be within the remit of core public health competencies, so there is a risk of public health decisions being made from a narrow focus on mental and physical health alone, when there is also a strong case for investment in primary health care, water and sanitation, reproductive health, nutrition and peace and security. The neglect of some of these aspects has been an important reason for the maladaptive and inequitable health outcomes that have been experienced around the world. There is also a danger that a narrow understanding of 'public health', divorced from social and economic factors, can lead to policies that ultimately fail to recognise the potential of social and economic factors to improve health in the real world. What does the future of public health look like? New forms of health organisation and governance are emerging at all levels of society. Health services are being transformed through the use of digital technology and a wide range of health interventions are being marketed. Meanwhile, there are signs that public health responsibilities are being privatised in a number of countries (e.g. Singapore, Canada, Australia and the US). At the global level, the global health community is itself being transformed through the involvement of increasingly diverse groups, including advocates for health and for social justice, policy and research institutions, and the media and information networks. These trends point to a new, and in many
