More specifically, the present invention relates to a system and method for performing acid fracturing, matrix acidizing, and sand fracture stimulation in a single wellbore. Acid fracturing, or matrix acidizing, is a stimulation technique for increasing the production of a wellbore. The technique involves placing a treatment fluid within the wellbore. The treatment fluid contains acids to etch the rock formation, thereby increasing the fracture or "crack" permeability to formation fluids. The acids can be strong, medium, or weak depending on the rock and the completion design. To induce formation damage, an acid "fracture fluid" is pumped into the borehole via pumps, tubing or coiled tubing. This fracture fluid flows through the subterranean formation until the fracture reaches the opening of the formation. As the fracture fluid flow out of the formation into the formation matrix, it comes into contact with the subterranean formation and thereby dissolves the rock therein. This dissolving process creates open, conductive channels through which fluids can more easily flow into the wellbore. This fracturing or "breaking" of the formation is typically accomplished by viscosity build-up and pressure buildup within the formation. The formation may be created in several ways. There are two primary methods. The first is by the formation of the fracture and the second method is by the use of proppant material in the treatment fluid. In the former case, the formation is broken by increasing the viscosity of the fracture
