A developmental study was performed on human infant. Bipedal locomotion at birth is not accompanied by well-developed masticatory behavior. jaw movement and its chewing probably develops functionally to prepare the infant for the subsequent stage of ontogeny, i.e., independent life. As the major component of the masticatory system, the jaw muscles must be functional well before the onset of the independent stage of ontogeny. We found that the jaw closing muscles are first differentially active at the newborn stage. The masseter was highly activated during the non-feeding (non-antennal-mouth) stage and developed a premature force bearing capacity. The temporalis muscle was minimally active and responded to mechanical stimulation well later than the masseter. Several muscular and morphological changes were observed in the jaw closing muscles at the newborn stage. No excitatory synaptic potentials for jaw movement were present in the masseter. The ultrastructure of muscle spindles and the first appearance of the capsular connective tissue were also immature. We concluded that the jaw closing muscles in the newborn have not yet developed their normal function. We speculated that the musculature of the infant jaw closes in response to mechanical stimuli in a premature and ineffective way, and that the infant chews a soft diet as the first step in the masticatory system development.Q: Как обработать JQuery в DataTables.Net MVC?
