David Baszucki and Erik Cassel founded Roblox in 2004 as a site for children to freely create games while connecting with their friends online. For a small fee, children could purchase and play Robux with which to download and play their games, or design and sell their own virtual items for real currency. Roblox quickly grew to over one million active users. Roblox continued to grow slowly in the early 2010s as a site for children to not only design and sell games, but also to develop their own games. In February 2013, the site announced that it would offer a subscription service for Robux, which allowed players to play any games created for the site for an annual fee. This move was seen as a way to fund the site's continued growth without selling virtual items for real-world money, though other games were available for free without any subscription or purchase. In November 2013, Roblox held an internal beta test for its new "Makers" feature. The feature allowed users to create virtual places, generate virtual items, publish and sell their creations, and establish communities of other Makers. Makers could access a built-in code editor that created games easily, and was protected from unwanted software. The Makers feature was officially released in December 2013. Roblox started to gain mainstream attention in the media in 2014, as publications such as Time, CNN, Bloomberg, and Fast Company published articles discussing Roblox and its growing user base. Roblox also sought to address criticisms of its creators by making developers and others more involved in moderating content. Roblox also began to make efforts to create a better game design process to ensure that games were developed to be both engaging and fun for the audiences they served. Developers could submit content to make it official to the Roblox website, where Roblox employees would check the games for ethics and quality and assign the games a number rating for the community. Developers could also sell their own games by purchasing virtual items with Robux, which were priced based on the number of users who played the games. Robux could also be used to download games to the Roblox website. Games that sold through Roblox could also be offered for sale outside the site through external developers, which led to the creation of similar game sites such as Steam, Newgrounds, Game Jolt, and the Microsoft Windows Store. By August 2015, Roblox had 250,000 game creators and 500,000 games. That
