Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a heat-developable photographic material and, more particularly, to an improved silver halide photographic material which exhibits good image keeping properties after the removal of remaining silver halide. 2. Description of the Prior Art It is well known that silver halide photographic materials contain a latent image which can be developed, upon exposure of said materials to visible light or infrared radiation, to form a visible image on said materials. There have been proposed various types of heat-developable silver halide photographic materials which can be developed in a considerably short period by heating them after exposure to visible light or infrared radiation. Such photographic materials are, for example, as described in British Pat. No. 1,151,469, U.S. Pat. Nos. 3,152,904, 3,457,075, 3,839,033 and 4,266,018. In such heat-developable silver halide photographic materials, a latent image of silver halide grains which is formed by exposure to light or radiation is developed, upon heating of the photographic materials after exposure, by a non-developed silver halide which serves as a catalyst for the development of said silver halide grains, and the developed silver halide grains thus formed are released as a result of heating. The heat-developable photographic materials are excellent in that the processing time can be considerably shortened by heating the materials after exposure and, therefore, they are very useful in the art. However, such heat-developable photographic materials are still not fully satisfactory in that the remaining photographic materials cannot be easily removed from the developed materials after the formation of an image by the development and the remaining materials are undesirable from the viewpoint of the image keeping property. In order to minimize the remaining materials in the heat-developable photographic materials, several techniques have been proposed, for example, as disclosed in Japanese patent application (OPI) No. 145040/74 and Japanese patent application (OPI) No. 131432/74. However, in such techniques a considerable period of time is still required for the removal of the heat-developable photographic materials. Febrile illnesses after organ transplantation in Brazil.
