Tipping Point (American book) Tipping Point: How Does Your Product or Service Affect How Much You'll Be Paid, and Why Should You Care? (October 23, 2017) is a business book by John Maxwell and Karen Davenport. Summary The authors present a business and consumer relationship model that builds upon the concepts of the "tipping point" in marketing and the "microconversation," which says that we're constantly communicating with our peers to stay relevant. For this to take place, the authors say that both consumers and business people must interact in meaningful ways and that they must have these meaningful interactions frequently. Once we have this "tipping point," then we tend to go places and do things that we wouldn't have done before. They identify these conversation points as being: Money Space Time Emotions These points lead to a cycle of marketing, communication and reputation that should be a high priority for any business. Reception Tipping Point has received favorable reviews. In his book, David G. Jaffe called the book "one of the best, if not THE best, guide to execution in the business world". In the book, Andy Stanley calls the book "transformative," "fearless", "persuasive" and "inspiring". Bob Burg and John David Mann called the book "compelling". systems, and more particularly to communications systems in which data is transmitted between a central station and a remote station.

Communication systems are well known in the art. For example, in the magnetic card reader art, it is known to provide a reader for reading characters printed on magnetic cards. This reader typically has a drive wheel and a magnetic head. The drive wheel is coupled to a motor. The magnetic head is positioned adjacent a side of the drive wheel and is rotated with it. Thus, the magnetic head scans the card and the drive wheel moves the character printed on the card past the magnetic head. The data which is read is converted to a signal which is decoded and output, typically through a printer. This decoding process typically includes decoding the data according to a known format. For example, so called "duplex" cards, i.e., cards having both magnetic and optical indicia, have a standard protocol by which the data is represented, so that an optical character reader may properly operate with the same. In the optical character reader (OCR) to card reading art, it is known to receive light in the form of a scanning beam of radiation and produce a signal indicative of the optical indicia on the card being scanned. The data thus read is decoded and may be output, usually through a printer. It has been found that the card reader must be closely spaced from the remote printer. Typically, the optical scanning and decoding circuitry is mounted to a circuit board which is attached to the drive wheel and the head.

Thus, the card reader and the remote printer, for example a
