

The Dayak people of Sabah make up about twenty percent of the state's population, and their culture goes back hundreds of years. There are also smaller groups of Dayak people on the island of Borneo near the Malaysian border, who make up only a fraction of the region's population. Prior to the 20th century the region was home to a diverse people. Many of them, such as the Balinese, Javanese, and Malay, have since either disappeared or mixed with other groups to become racially distinctive peoples. The larger group of Malay people are the majority population in Sabah today. They are Bornean Malays, and historically the Dayaks and Bugis are said to be of Indian descent. They speak Malay, which is a language that developed from a variety of closely related languages in the Malay peninsula, Sumatra, and Maluku. The Malays, along with some groups of Bisaya (Visayans) and Minangkabau, are believed to have originated in Indonesia. The Dayak people of Sabah are not ethnically related to the Dayak people of Kalimantan. They have an entirely different culture and language. Sabah Dayaks' skills with rifles and spears, and adat (traditional) ways of interacting with their forest environment, have led them to earn the nickname 'Bojol Dayaks'. This is a reference to Bojolan binti Cempaka, who is the most well-known female Dayak. She is said to have the ability to remove spines with just her hands. Dayak political involvement in Malaysian politics started in the 1960s and 1970s, and many Dayaks have served as non-elected members of parliament since then. However, two have served as elected members of parliament, and at least two Dayak leaders were elected as state leaders in Sabah. There was an estimated 100,000 Dayaks in Sabah at the turn of the 21st century. Many live in areas that are economically disadvantaged, and some are displaced from traditional lands, giving rise to concerns about deforestation. Some of the Dayak groups also maintain a status as independent settlements, such as Kepayang, which is jointly claimed by Dayaks and the local indigenous population of the West Coast. The Dayak people of Sabah have a long history of tribal conflict, especially with the Malays. This conflict began during British colonial rule, and intensified following the imposition of British North
