But how do companies that design the technology create devices that could potentially be hazardous to people's health? A rigorous review of the risks and benefits, or lack thereof, for people using cell phones has led one group of doctors and scientists to call on the Federal Communications Commission and the wireless industry to change their course. They are urging the FCC to reconsider the power and limits of devices that have become a global phenomenon. "Policy makers, the medical profession and the public at large have been lulled to sleep by the scientific community that is promoting one side of the issue, and by the wireless industry that is promoting the other," said one of the scientists in a statement. This is a point echoed by other experts who say the wireless industry continues to promote their devices despite the little-known risks. The US Food and Drug Administration has said there is no evidence to prove that cell phones cause cancer and have no impact on brain development in children. But, doctors and safety experts say, risk cannot be overstated. JUST WATCHED How cell phones became a ubiquitous necessity Replay More Videos...
