apa wants the courts to remand the decision so the fcc can clarify that the agency needs to take into account the harms to the public that would result from preemption of multiple applications and treat such intertemporaries the same way it treats contemporaneous applications. this week, one of the first cases of a major change window for translator applications began. the fcc had issued a notice of proposed rulemaking for these purposes in a case involving the electronic communication services commission (ecsc or the fcc). the notice proposed to extend the timeframe of a major change for applicants seeking to serve multiple large markets by way of translators. translators often spend decades providing the same service to the same community. but it is this long-term, customer-focused focus that has helped them survive in the face of marketplace and regulatory changes that have made it more difficult to support those businesses. however, operators have had to adjust their staffing levels or alter the hours of their transmission and reception to reflect changes in the marketplace. part of the good intentions behind the transition to a single window of major changes, or system modification, is to give translator applicants more flexibility to address the market. these applicants are, often for the first time in their history, required to make on-air changes to their operation. apa maintains that the commission did not adequately discuss the harms to customers from this practice. in particular, translator providers do not have the ability to build out equipment and facilities for multiple markets simultaneously or to dedicate resources to serving smaller markets.
