For example, you cannot see how the final result was influenced by the settings selected in the past or in the current iteration of the workflow. Even a blind look cannot reveal the differences. To be fair, I should find out where the differences lie and then present a comprehensive comparison in my next review. And yet I do not want to do that. I want to save you time, so I do it now, in writing. For reasons that may reach beyond technology. I have already stated that I would certainly like to see and hear about changes in Color tools, a better importing and exporting friction and the ability to make changes on a stable platform; things like that. Of course, we should not expect Adobe to release the underlying technologies that they would be forced to rapidly and continuously evolve. But it is not too much to expect a company that is as good as Adobe to at least optimize and optimize constantly.
