Adobe has always been the standard of post-production software, but I suspect it's going to continue to be so for some time. For anyone who needs to make a good-looking finished product for just about any kind of printing or publishing, you're going to need Photoshop. It's comprehensive, it's reliable, and it's just an overall damn good application. Of course, the initial cost can be prohibitive, especially for a beginner. A one-time cost of $199 or more is a lot to pay for an app with limitless potential. Fortunately, the current Creative Cloud offer gives you a 30-day trial, and it's yours to keep if you decide it works for you. If your budget doesn't allow for the "forever" subscription, you can also purchase a single license for $199. Your choice then is between standard and portable versions. I think it's much more useful and practical to have the standard version. I'll admit that Photoshop is a little like my old tuxedo. It's comfortable, well-loved, comfortable again and again, and yet it can be made over in a million different ways by a million different people. I know. I've worn that tuxedo many times, and have been comfortable all those years. But I don't own a tuxedo that fits me. Or for that matter, does anyone else own one? Gone are the days when the one and only companion of a professional photographer was his or her camera and a little time. Today, a photographer needs someone to trust him or her to make magical things happen right here on the internet, usually in a matter of hours.

All colors are made up of varying amounts of each of the three colors: red, green, and blue. By histogram we are looking at the distribution of intensity for each color. A histogram resembles a bar graph where the value of the bar increases from left to right. For red bars, the value decreases from left to right. If necessary, we use a histogram to see if we're using a color properly. If a color is too bright or too low, this will show up in the histogram. Far too often now when I'm out walking down the road I do photography, even though I can't be bothered to pull out my camera!

This week I was walking down my rather busy street when I noticed an individual in front of me who had stopped to take in the view. He wore a smile on his face that seemed to say "What do I have to do to get you to snap a picture?!" Often we go by without even noticing the things we see. This can be because we may be in a hurry to get somewhere or simply because we don't see with the searching eyes of an artist (or photographer). The truth is that things we take for granted are often really important to us. They make us feel good. My top pick this week is to smile, not only because you don't even have to do anything, but it communicates friendliness and confidence. And if you think it's "too much" to ask of people then smile at people who smile at you, it just might spread.
