Remove the search gap for Firefox in Chrome: Google Chrome and Mozilla Firefox both have their strengths, but they also have weaknesses. Here's how to use Firefox as your default browser and have Chrome run only in incognito mode. You may have noticed that when you open Chrome and close it, then open it again, it looks like it has been opened for the first time. You know the feeling. When you open Chrome for the first time, it installs some fonts and updates settings. This occurs even if you open Chrome every day. What if you could remove those updates, and avoid having to re-install Chrome each time? The next time you open Chrome, it will look like it has been opened for the first time. Your browser. Your data. Your privacy. This video shows how to use Firefox as the default browser, so that Chrome only runs in incognito mode when you open it, and still looks and feels like the browser you have been using for months. Why open Chrome in incognito mode? Running Chrome in incognito mode will prevent some of your browsing data, like saved passwords and your browsing history, from being saved to your Google Account. If you are concerned about security, privacy, or the efficiency of the web, you should be running Chrome in incognito mode. Chrome runs in a special type of mode called incognito mode. Incognito mode is Chrome's version of private browsing mode. You can run Chrome in incognito mode by going to the menu bar and selecting File → New Incognito Window. The menu bar is the top-right hand side of your Chrome window. When you start a new incognito window, Chrome will ask if you want to run it incognito, and offer to save some of your browsing data. I recommend accepting the terms and proceeding. When you start Chrome again, it will look like it's the first time you've opened it. Unlike the regular Chrome window, this one will not store any of your browsing data on your Google account, or the cloud. This is a great way to keep some of your browsing information private. Start Firefox in incognito mode The incognito mode in Chrome is great, but there's one thing it lacks: It doesn't run any webpages in incognito. That's why I recommend using Firefox instead. Open Firefox and go to File → New Incogn
