Adobe Photoshop is known for network-connectivity capabilities. For example, users can connect Photoshop to their online web server, where they can edit the original files, "edit in place", so that the modifications are applied to the source files. They can connect to local files, or even to external ones. Having all of this from a single program is its great feature. The new features are all split up into various components (like styles, filters, brushes, etc.) rather than having them all in one large panel. The "bucket of features" is conceptually straightforward; you Ctrl-click on a component group to make it visible and then click on tools to indicate what you want to use it for, and the corresponding image area will be highlighted. Items are compressed in the UI to reduce memory use, so you don't actually have to load the entire catalog into memory. Its new features include the ability to choose a multi-file workflow, which lets you select multiple images in one frame and apply changes to them all at once. Lightroom users can edit all the images at once, or use a variety of other ways, including the same push method that Photoshop uses. Users can also use groups to reflect all the changes back to a single image. Lightroom introduced the concept of editing an image in a browser, which utilizes all of your desktop's processing power and memory without having to actually copy the images over. It allows you to edit images in a "real world" type of environment, allowing you to see the effects as they play out. It also lets you view thumbnails of the other images in your photo libraries while you work on a single image. Lightroom users can edit all the images at once, or use a variety of other ways, including the same push method that Photoshop uses.
