As you can see from the screenshots below, most of the interface has been streamlined. The user interface is much more slick and simple. I have to admit that I bombed through the interface in such a short time that I can't really offer much for the design or improvements. But if you are happy with Photoshop Elements, then you should take a look at what Adobe introduces in Photoshop and Photoshop Lightroom. Looking at the products' sales page, one might think Adobe's ambition with Photoshop Sketch was to first woo film-makers. And in many ways, it is. But its marketing branding reads as a real blow to photographers -- and there are a lot of us in the world. Adobe has taken one more step toward making its users' lives easier by adopting the Save 2 Files feature. This new option is found in the Export menu, where you can now save your image to a JPEG file, and also save both a Photoshop document and an Adobe XMP file, with permissions based on the destination file. The XMP file retains all of the settings used to create the image and the documented metadata. Even so, Adobe has managed to create a very powerful photo editing program at a low price. The emphasis on simplicity and speed has been accentuated on the new 2020 release of Photoshop, and for the most part this is a good thing. Too many Photoshop users have gotten used to being able to jump right in and do all sorts of image editing right away. This program can, and for many people, does.

It is truly surprising that in a very short time, the Web has reached a critical mass of functionality. For example, with an additional browser plug-in (the Chrome plugin is obvious being the most popular choice), an organization can now upload images into Google Cloud and use the giant search engine like Google Images to search the contents of their images. In the past, the process was complex and time consuming so having such a function included with Photoshop completely changes the dynamic. The unification of the creative online/offline experience will only accelerate with moving away from the legacy API of Photoshop to HTML5. After all, the goal is to make Photoshop the best app in the browser.
