The suitability of an IVORDS (Cervical Gels) to standardize cervical caps used in the European Union (EU) was investigated. In Experiment 1, cervical mucus of pregnant domestic merino ewes was collected and cervical caps were produced and frozen. Caps were submitted to 5 cycles of freeze/thaw; morphology, shrinkage, and adhesiveness were assessed. Caps produced from cervical mucus of each of 3 pregnant ewes were subjected to the same test. Caps failed to retain their shape and adhesion characteristics following 4 cycles of freeze/thaw. The caps produced from cervical mucus of a nonpregnant ewe gave results which were comparable with results from the 3 pregnant ewes, but all ewes were not used. The results were interpreted as indicating that the cervix mucus matrix was likely to be a potential source of variability in shape and adhesion of caps. In Experiment 2, the formulation used in the test was modified to increase the viscosity of the gel-like material during the freezing process, by including gelling agents. Caps were produced using 4 different viscosities of gelling agent with reference to test procedure 1; and phase microscopy was used to determine freeze damage. Caps produced with the highest viscosity gelling agent gave different results to those produced
