I told you times were changing. Now you can say "I want to check a feature before updating the open file". Photoshop will send you a folder containing the file, but you can open and view it without needing to wait for it to open and validate. You can also tell Photoshop to save changes to the source file you and the reviewer approved, so when it's time to save a JPEG, you simply choose the "Save As..." option and select the updated file you approved. This ensures that you're saving the updated version to specific file location, and not just throwing a new version in top of all of the previous changes you made. Last but not least: Open dialog window now supports file dragging and dropping . When you're done making the changes, simply drop the file on the open folder spot (like in Windows Explorer), and Photoshop wants you to pick it up - and vice versa.
