The initial release brought the new AI called Sensei into Photoshop with a Sharpening adjustment. Most people probably thought Sharpening was pretty basic. Well, Adobe has turned that new Sharpening feature into a much larger adjustment. In many cases it will give the result of a Magic Wand conversion, and the same is true for even the most obscure point-and-click adjustment. This, of course, means experienced and proficient Photoshop users will have to educate the AI on their own style of adjustments, and these experiences could be shared on Photoshop's Creative Cloud social network. There is a time and place for AI, such as medicine and defense, and there is a place for AI in photography. But ultimately, AI should be used to get the job done, not to do it. It's difficult to see how Adobe could possibly justify letting its tools do more than you can manually. An example of a possible user-generated outcome of Sensei is creating a family portrait, where there are three members of the family standing in front of a fence, and you want to crop out the fence, the dark, muddy background, and the men's shoes. When Sensei was introduced the idea was to provide the tools to make adjustments much faster than you could, since the AI is claims to be able to do much of the processing work for you. So far, the Sharpening, Retouch, and Tone curve tools are the most significant. The features offer as a photographer. Some are at your disposal and the others are hidden away or just out of reach. Now that the browser is getting better at handling large web applications, Adobe is developing Photoshops web application and has even started testing its web application with industry leaders, and the company is planning to launch the web application publicly next year. 933d7f57e6
