As good as it is, Photoshop has always been a single-operation system. You don't do anything except export a single image, and that's it. That's why the idea of a Photoshop app that works with other external apps are interesting. Toony is a brand new feature that works on top of Photoshop, and I'll show you how to use it. I don't see the point in trying another app for the same task. To do a HDR I would have to pay for another app. I need free apps for the foreseeable future.
Adobe gives people the crap version they expect. They don't supply full versions but a modified version for people to download. They don't have a web page up where you can download complete versions. They just give you the crap they think is good enough for the masses.
When it's a crap app you think \"maybe I'm too stupid to figure it out\" and when it's the exact same app with a different name you think maybe they want to keep the masses from figuring it out.\" They give you the name and a link and that's it.
What a rip off. It doesn't seem fair to me. They don't support a free dev platform. They want you to pay $20.00 or more. They want you to pay for a company.
I open source and use a free platform. I charge $ for support, web services, and more. It's good to be able to offer more. I want to be able to do more. I'm giving you my software free. Why would I expect anything more from Adobe?

They're a rip off and don't even pretend to want to support the community. It's sad and this is the first time I've had to call someone to get the software I want. I'm considering switching to a more expensive app. I don't recommend anyone to buy or use anything from Adobe. They're a major financial rip off. Why should I even consider them when I have alternatives?
