1. Experience
- Depending on the task you are performing, the number of tools you will use and how you will apply the tools in the process, the time it takes to learn the software can be different. The most experienced Photoshop users usually have the skills and tools to deal with any type of task but it is up to the user to judge what tools they need and how to use them. 2. System quality
- Just as experience varies, the quality of your computer is going to impact the processing time of the program. Photoshop and Illustrator are very heavy programs; therefore, it is important to have a powerful computer to be able to run them without crashing or slowing down. The type of computer you use is dependent on what you're using Photoshop for. You may be designing logos or websites, the amount of files you have open will be high and you may need a computer which has the RAM to handle these files. If you are working with characters for a video game, the more RAM you can have, the smoother your performance will be. Photographers have very low demands because they use the program for ISO size prints. Users that work with RAW files usually have a program that can open the RAW files. If you are not sure what programs your RAW file came in, ask the person who sent it to you. 3. The quality of the document itself
- This is the most important part of the process. Whether you are designing your website, your morning paper, or a photograph of a pimple on your nose, the quality of the document is in your control. That is why it is important to have the most reliable, powerful and stable computer you can afford. However, the quality of the document itself can only cater to the circumstances under which it was produced. In the case of a camera, the quality of the document is dependent on the camera itself. In the case of the work on a computer, the quality of the document is dependent on the application you are using to print the finished products. If you are designing for print, it is best to use the highest quality sizes you can. There is no reason to leave print at anything less than 300ppi and any resolution the final product needs. e3d0a04c9c
