It is a prequel to the previous game, and is arguably more well known, but this sequel is easier to "To this day, if I ever get the urge to drink two beers in one sitting, I switch off my phone." Those were the words of BrewDog founder James Watt in the August issue of Wired magazine. He had recently completed a whirlwind tour of New Zealand with Dave Peacock in his specially-built mobile brewery, Hot Water - 'A hot shower for beers, not bathtubs' - making a trademark of his belief that a craft beer drinker should be able to 'have a ball with their beer'. Beer and technology are closely linked. Just think of the eighteenth-century ale brewers who - by using a pump with a spring to force water up through a long copper tube – created the first beer refrigeration system. The first brewers' recipe books – the first reference to the use of hops or the depth of the wort – all date to around the 1660s, which must have been the time when modern beer making was invented. One hundred years later, and James Watt would be born. He would see the continuing evolutions of the brewery, and the industrial revolution that followed, and pioneer the new age of the microbrewery. How did we get here? A wild-idea meet the right brewer with the right brewing equipment? A modern mash tun, a copper kettle for a pale ale and an automatic, three-stage fermentation? And what about the drivers? For the last 150 years, many beer drinkers have – and still believe – that the better quality their beer, the better the taste. That once the ale has been brewed, and the fermentation begun, to get the maximum alcohol level is the wrong way to go. Instead, the best way is to make the beer as soon as possible, and let the yeast do the work for you. Then the drinker chooses from the different styles, but is also influenced by the technologies available. For every bitter you can have a hoppy ale, a lager, a strong ale, a black ale and so on. But what if you want to go further? Or, if you have a very good quality of malt available, what if you wanted to try something very unusual? This is where the brewer comes in. In 1870, when brewing that had been carried on for centuries, was revolutionised when the realisation that there are many different kinds of drink, and
